Housing is a basic need that, for many all over the world, remains unmet or inadequate. In order to ensure the availability of quality living space for everyone, architecture and urban development can contribute significantly to finding new solutions. The challenge of affordable housing lies in achieving an optimum relationship between costs and the "home quality" value, which is dependent on many local parameters and cultural preferences.

Suitable, affordable housing is key to our economic prosperity and stability, to our ability to innovate and grow, to ensuring that no one is left behind. As Matthew Desmond puts it in his Pulitzer Prize winning book Evicted, "Housing is absolutely essential to human flourishing. Without stable shelter, it all falls apart." 1
