Animals are significant in the novel in many ways: one being, the way Candys dog dies, a bullet to the back of the head, foreshadows how Lennie is to die at the end of the novel. You could also add to this point by saying that the dog was being put out of its misery and so was Lennie as he didn't fit in with society.

Lennie loves to pet soft things, such as small animals, dresses and people's hair, this leads to many disasters. His enthusiasm for the vision of their future farm proves contagious as he convinces George, Candy, Crooks, and the reader that such a paradise might be possible even though the dream is almost impossible and has been tried and failed many times before.
