In the same issue, serious doubts about informed consent to participation in clinical research were raised in a paper by the British clinical pharmacologist JC Garnham.2This presented evidence that only 'med- ically trained people', and sometimes not even all of them, when recruited as subjects of non- therapeutic clinical research, demonstrated suffi- cient understanding of the implications of their voluntary consent for it to be meaningfully consid- ered 'informed'.

PAPER The impossibility of informed consent? One of the most common assumptions about informed consent—that its ethical basis is respect for autonomy or the self-determination of the patient—was radically challenged in a 2003 paper by the Kantian philosopher O'Neill11 from the UK, entitled 'Some limits of informed consent'. Among these limits, O'Neill observed, was that only competent patients could give informed consent, and even among them, this was practically difficult or impossible for those rendered vulnerable by illness ...
